- The precise format description for all types of papers is available on Journal Web site.
- Remember that, though we accept any (easily printable) format for submissions, the final versions of all papers have to be provided in Word format.

Review process- What happens after a paper has been submitted?

- First, the Editor-in-Chief sends it to Section Editor (most likely one of the Associate Editors if they are not too busy).
- The Section Editor finds at least 3 independent reviewers. Most likely again, one of them is a member of the Editorial Board.
- When all reviewers have entered their review in the system, the Section Editor can either make a recommendation to the Editor-in-Chief, based on the reviews and his/her own opinion, or start a discussion among the reviewers if there is some disagreement.
- After an agreed decision has been reached, the authors are notified by the Editor-in-Chief or the section Editor.
- The possible decisions are
 - The paper is accepted and it can be published as it is (except for some typos).

Accept with minor revisions: the paper will have to be slightly revised following the reviewers' comments, but there will not be any additional round of review, only the section Editor and/or the Editor-in-Chief will check the modifications.

Revised and resubmit: it is agreed that the topic is worth publishing, but the paper requires large revisions before it can actually be published. The revised paper will not be considered as a completely new submission, though: if a revised version is sent within 3 months, it will most probably be handled by the same section Editor.
